Do you ever hesitate to take chances or try new things? Do you sometimes avoid gatherings because you "might not have a good time," or you are too tired, or you are just plain afraid of being uncomfortable or out of place? Have you ever stayed home and then wished you have been a bit braver?

Sometimes it is just a matter of weighing the possibilities against the probabilities. Start by weighing the chance of spending time on an interesting new experience against what you would be doing instead. Balance the opportunity to meet someone special against being a little uncomfortable. Consider the thought that something different in your life could make you feel less tired.

Remember the story of the woman who hesitated to return to school because she would be so old when she got her degree and whose life was changed by the friend who simply asked "and how old will you be if you don't get your degree?"

Among the four questions posed—Should the City of Rochester-owned property be maintained in its present state?—76 percent of those responding said yes, while 13 percent said no and one percent had no answer. A second—Would you object to recreation or conservation developments on this land?—saw 41 percent in the affirmative while 54 percent were opposed and five percent had no answer.

The lawmaker also asked—"would you be willing to pay higher taxes to keep this land as is?" This drew a varied breakdown of responses. Fifty-one percent said they would not be willing to boost tax payments while 22 percent said they would up to three percent, 10 percent replied the would pay up to five percent more and seven percent said they would pay up to 10 percent more.

In announcing the survey outcome, Hasper said "it was indeed gratifying to see the large number of returns and the specific comments and suggestions included by many people. Hasper said he would do "everything possible to prevent any tax loss to the affected municipalities and will continue to work with the local governments involved, the Coalition for Hemlock and Canadice lakes and the residents in that area to bring about the most cost-effective solutions for future use of the unique and beautiful area."
